Recently, the Kaohsiung police department and the Bureau of Investigation cracked the biggest data-theft case ever to have hit Taiwan, involving the leaking of personal information on more than 10 million individuals. This 53 has not only seriously affected public and financial order, but has also shown that Taiwan's data security system needs a thorough overhaul.

The Kaohsiung police discovered that personal data on more than 10 million individuals had been sold by Y. L. International Marketing Corporation to various 54 syndicates. The suspects confessed that more than ten criminal gangs had bought the data to send out fraudulent letters and text messages telling people that they had won prizes. Following a six-month investigation, the Kaohsiung field office of the Bureau of Investigation 55 a large-scale search of dozens of offices of a major telecommunication company and credit information agencies throughout Taiwan. The southern field office of the Criminal Investigation Bureau and mobile inspection units of the South Coast Guard Bureau 56 large amounts of client data and telephone monitoring tapes. They also summoned more than 30 people for questioning.

The devolution of immigration policing authority from the federal to local governments represents a sharp break with a long-established tradition of federal control over all aspects of immigration enforcement. In the past, state and local police forces played only a supportive role in immigration affairs, sometimes sharing information about those they had detained as criminal suspects or assisting in enforcement actions. The federal government could not require local governments to do immigration policing. Police powers were constitutionally reserved for the states and their jurisdictional subunits, an arrangement that provided localities with significant flexibility and autonomy. However, with the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDPA) and the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act (IIRIRA), the federal government has created an opening for localities to ask their police officers to be trained by and to join the federal government in enforcing immigration laws within the interior of the United States. Thus, beginning in 2002, informal working relationships between local police and federal immigration agents have developed. For example, some local police departments are now seeking formal training from federal immigration authorities. Federal agents are also embedded in some police departments to assist in enforcement of drug and human smuggling laws. A number of state prisons and local jails send the names of criminal suspects to federal authorities to be checked for immigration violations. And an increasing number of police departments are electing to do their own immigration status checks. Such an increased involvement of state and local police departments in immigrant affairs has given rise to what some observers are calling "immigration federalism."

- What is the passage mainly about?
 - (A) The importance of cooperation between federal and local governments in immigration affairs.
 - (B) The enhanced role of local governments in immigration policing.
 - (C) The impact of new immigration policies on foreign affairs.
 - (D) The decline of the U.S. federal government.
- Which of the following statements is true according to the passage?
 - (A) The IIRIRA prohibits local authorities from checking the status of immigrants.
 - (B) Sharing immigrant information between federal and local authorities had been a long-established tradition before 2002.
 - (C) Before the AEDPA and IIRIRA, local governments enjoyed more freedom from federal control and influence.
 - (D)Before 2002, state police departments were required to cooperate with federal authorities in investigating immigration cases.
- What does the underlined pronoun "they" refer to?
 - (A)Suspects detained by the state and local police forces. (B)Undocumented immigrants.
 - (C) The federal law enforcement agents. (D) The state and local police forces.
- What may the term "immigration federalism" (last line) most likely mean?
 - (A) Sharing of powers on immigration between the federal and state governments.
 - (B) All the immigration agents in the U.S.
 - (C) Immigrants coming from all parts of the world.
 - (D) The sole legitimate federal authority in immigration policing.
