John would neither hear Grandpa sing again nor see Grandpa every day.

Grandpa said, "John, will you look at what your father has given me to go away with? A lot of fine clothes."

Dad cleared his throat and said, "I wanted you to have the best."

"Yes," said Grandpa, "but they are too many for an old man who's going away!"

"Oh, Grandpa is right," said John coldly. "Dad, I want to keep some of them. Two pieces of clothing would be enough for an old man when he's sent away."

Dad asked, "Now, what do you mean by that?"

In business today, it is sometimes very hard to make the right decisions. In a South American country, native people in the tropical rain forest capture beautiful birds and sell them to traders who in turn sell the birds to people in other countries. Some of these birds are in danger of extinction, which means that their species or kinds would no longer exist on the earth. The best thing would be for the government to restrict the buying and selling of these tropical birds, but then the preliterate native people would lose their means of survival. An alternative source of income for the people in these remote areas should be found so that on the one hand the birds can be protected and on the other the native hunters have a new way of making a living.
