(一)While government officials and manufacturers focus their efforts on improving and marketing LED technology, researchers and entrepreneurs have been pursuing others, convinced that none of the options on the market offer consumers a close enough match to the familiar light quality at a low enough price. Now two start-ups are poised to begin selling bulbs that use entirely different technologies than compact fluorescents and LEDs – one borrowed from heavy industry and the other from old-fashioned televisions.

At a small lab here, just outside Boston, work is proceeding on a new bulb to be called Finally. It is the quest of John Goscha, 30, who has already had one successful start-up: IdeaPaint, which allows most surfaces to function as dry-erase boards. About three years ago, eager to do something new he enlisted the help of Victor Roberts, a former General Electric engineer who joined the venture. (20分)
