四、閱讀測驗【請在下列各題中選出最適當的答案】

第一篇：

Every so often a company comes along and executes on a business plan so simple that it leaves thousands of would-be entrepreneurs on the sidelines asking one shared question, “Why didn’t I think of that?” Warby Parker, a high-end eyewear retailer, is one of those companies. Since 2010, the company has disrupted a monopolistic company with 60-80% market share in the U.S. and become an inspiration for other aspiring businesses. Part of its success could be traced to its pricing model.

In 2010, Warby Parker entered the eyewear market, which was being dominated by the overlord of eyewear, Luxottica. Luxottica owns an array of brands like Oakley and Ray-Ban and their retail banners include the likes of LensCrafters, Pearle Vision, and Sunglass Hut. Its huge market share had allowed Luxottica to basically control the price of designer eyewear and take huge profits. But by setting the price bar so high ($500 for a pair of glasses? Seriously?), Luxottica gave plenty of room for competitors to move into the market. In order to make a serious play in the eyeglass industry, Warby Parker needed to answer the question as to why glasses cost so much?

Through research Warby Parker found that most brands didn’t design or manufacture their own glasses; these brands sold those rights to huge companies like Luxottica. And that’s where the prices of eyewear were inflated. By deciding to design and manufacture their own glasses, Warby Parker was able to drastically reduce the price of its product. Basically, they cut out the middleman. As a result, the vast majority of Warby Parker glasses sells for a reasonable rate of $95. (Titanium frames are $145.) Beyond offering better prices, Warby Parker strategically uses a uniform pricing system that comes as a relief to overwhelmed consumers.

This idea of vertical integration is far from new, but it has been extremely effective. By internally handling processes that were typically outsourced, Warby Parker was able to control price. As a result, Warby Parker has been extremely successful in an industry where its competitors had previously felt very comfortable. As of April 2015, Warby Parker was valued at $1.2 billion.

Like an attorney arguing a case, Rodriguez pitched the applicant to fellow admissions officers seated as an internal court of gatekeepers for the university. The student came from a suburban public high schools. She had strong grades but so-so SAT marks. Rodriguez liked her essay and extracurricular activity records, and saw a “pretty good upward trend” in performance. “She’s compelling,” agreed Nixon, leader of the committee. But another officer, skimming evidence from the file on his laptop, raised objections. He said he worried about the student’s class rank and course selection. Debate on the 18-member committee lasted 22 minutes until Nixon called for a vote. Only Rodriguez raised his hand for admission; others voted to deny. With that verdict, one case was settled among more than 30,000 to be decided.

The scene gave a glimpse of how a prominent U.S. university strives to fulfill its promise that every prospective student will get a close look, or “holistic review,” even in an era of surging applications. It also showed the complex and subjective interplay of factors determining who gets in — and who does not. Most anxious college-bound students can only guess at what gets said about applications they toiled to complete. But this time the university allowed journalists into the room to show how decisions unfold. “People believe it’s formulaic,” said Professor Gundy, director of undergraduate admissions. “That’s just not true.” Across U.S., major universities have been inundated by applications. The latest available data shows the 50 state flagship universities received 1.3 million applications in 2016, up 79 percent compared with a decade earlier. The admissions frenzy intensified as the size of entering classes grew at a far slower pace.

The university employs about 60 “readers,” including year-round admissions staff as well as graduate students and retired admissions officers who work part-time in the high season. On average, a good reader can rate an application in about seven to eight minutes. It would be cheaper and more efficient to screen applicants primarily on grade-point averages and test scores — which was, in fact, standard practice until 2006. But a by-the-numbers approach would be totally destructive. Which applicant is stronger, a student with a 3.8 grade-point average or one with a 3.5? Most people will say it depends, and that’s exactly right.

【1】36. What is an appropriate title for this passage?

- ① Inside the black box of college admission.
- ② Unfolding the secrets of a court verdict.

【4】37. Where does the scene as described in paragraph 1 likely take place?

- ① For students, it was more competitive ten years ago than it is now.
- ② Applicants with higher GPAs get admitted before those with lower GPAs.
- ③ Both full-time and part-time employees are hired to screen the applications.
- ④ Unanimous agreement among committee members on each case is necessary.
