Situation: Joan Brown wrote this email to her supervisor, Mr. Green.

From: jbamco@amaco.bus.tw

To: rgamaco@amaco.bus.tw

Subject: Problem with new employee

Dear Mr. Green,

As you know, I am the sales manager for Amaco's cellphone department. I am writing this email in hopes that you could provide some assistance concerning a new salesperson, Mr. John Michaels.

Mr. Michaels was hired this month by the Human Resources Department. He has demonstrated that he takes his position seriously. He arrives early at the office, and has contacted all customers assigned to him, as well as a number of other potential customers.

He is also very familiar with our products. He can explain clearly all the functions of the cellphones we currently offer. He undoubtedly understands products that the Research and Development Department employees are still working on, and has even contributed beneficial ideas to them.

Unfortunately, our customers are frustrated with his inability to understand their needs, and I am concerned about losing customers. Even though he has contacted potential new customers, he has not successfully made any new sales.

Thank you for your attention to this matter. I would appreciate any suggestions that you might have.

Best regards,

Joan Brown

Sales Manager

A new study, published by the Rapid Transition Alliance(RTA), has revealed that climate change will threaten worldwide sports events over the next three decades. RTA monitors climate change, development and global issues. Researchers said that nearly all sports would be impacted by what they called "an accelerating climate crisis." They highlighted how the weather has already messed up major sports events. Bushfires in Australia made playing conditions hazardous at the Australian Tennis Open and drenching rain from a huge typhoon disrupted last year's Rugby World Cup in Japan. The report predicts that fires, floods, heatwaves and rising sea levels will cause greater disruption.

Andrew Simms, the coordinator of RTA, urged the sports industry to do more to become carbon-neutral. He said: "Sport provides some of society's most influential role models. If sport can change how it operates to act at the speed and scale necessary to halt the climate emergency, others will follow." He added that the carbon emissions from sports events worldwide are equal to those produced by a medium-sized country. The report's author, David Goldblatt, said sport should be more proactive. He said: "Making a carbon-zero world the common-sense priority of the sports world would make a huge contribution to making it the common-sense priority of all politics."

- ( A )41. What kind of climate crisis did researchers say there was?
 (A) an escalating crisis (B) a serious crisis (C) a manageable crisis (D) a decades-old crisis
